The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill has told the the NCAA that it lacks the authority to issue sanctions on five allegation of academic irregularities involving student-athletes saying those affairs were under the jurisdiction of its accreditation agency.

UNC

disagreed with a charge of "lack of institutional control" stating, "Issues related to

UNC-Chapel

Hill's academic irregularities are the proper subject of review by

SACSCOC

, its accrediting agency – not the NCAA, its athletic association."

"We work with an accrediting agency; the NCAA is the athletic agency," athletics director Bubba Cunningham said Tuesday in a conference call. "We think they have different jurisdictions."

UNC

UNC

is also challenging all academic related charges, including "failure to monitor" on both the NCAA's statute of limitations (four years) and the NCAA's "jurisdiction over the academic affairs."

UNC-Chapel

Hill accepts full responsibility for its serious past academic problems, and it has addressed them directly without regard to cost or reputational harm," the response reads. "But ... The question is whether the matters raised by the meet the jurisdictional, procedural, and substantive requirements of the NCAA constitution and bylaws."

A public copy of the response was made available on the Carolina Commitment website one day after the university formally submitted the response to the NCAA.

requested, and was granted, a one-week extension by the NCAA to deliver the response. Their 90-day time to respond expired July 25.

UNC

will now await the NCAA's response. They will then arrange a date to meet with the NCAA Committee on Infractions. It is at that meeting where they will learn whether the university will be subject to any punishment. The NCAA generally takes between eight and 12 weeks to deliver that after the hearing which could push the finality of the investigation into 2017.

No current coaches at
were named in the latest allegations.
